I am thankful of the opportunity to present to the committee some views of the role of Puerto Rico in international relations, particularly as they refer to the Caribbean and Latin America.

I shall tackle my brief remarks on my studies of the subject, as well as on my experiences in both the federal and Commonwealth Governments.

When I refer to international relations I do not limit my views to the formal, diplomatic pattern. International relations transcend today the traditional areas of concern. They grew out of the revolution in communications, the intricate web of world trade relations, the interpenetration of cultures, the close contacts in such areas of sports and science, the need for clean cooperation to combat the scourge of drugs and smuggling.

Some areas are more exposed to these shifting currentsthan others; their exposure has to do with geography and history. Such is the case of Puerto Rico. Geographically located at the center of the West Indian chain of islands, its close contiguity to the rest of the Caribbean makes it one of the crossroads of this area and one of its key strategic positions.

In the great struggles of the past for the dominance of the Caribbean, Puerto Rico played a crucial role under Spain, as a "Key to the Indies," or the "strongest foothold of Spain in America." After the Spanish-American War, the noted American navalist, Alfred Mahan, called it a Caribbean Malta.
If it was extremely difficult for a European state to sustain operations in the Eastern Mediterranean with a British fleet at Malta, similarly it would be very difficult “for a transatlantic state to maintain operations in the Western Caribbean with a U.S. fleet based upon Puerto Rico and the adjacent islands.” During the Second World War, Puerto Rico was called an American Gibraltar and was one of the key elements in the so-called Rainbow Plans for the hemispheric defense. In a recent paper written for a 1981-1982 seminar, Colonel Frank H. Butler referred to the naval base at Roosevelt Roads “the most important U.S. installation in the Caribbean...” and emphasized the role of Puerto Rico for the maintenance of relief efforts in the Caribbean for the interception of illegal drugs and for important search and rescue missions. Furthermore, Puerto Rico is a center of technological communications in the region.

Geography has dictated Puerto Rico’s strategic role. But history has emphasized its ties with the Caribbean and cultural profile of the people. In language, in cultural mores, in ethnic mixture, Puerto Rico is very much a part of the Caribbean. Historically, it has received and is receiving peoples from the area; Cubans, Dominicans, migrants from the Windward Antilles. The popular folklore is influenced by these human contacts; the high uncertainty culture, by the cross-currents of Spanish, Spanish-American Trends, which merge with powerful U.S. influences. Whether in the field of sports or recreation, or in the area of agriculture... and cultural expression, Puerto Rico has a distinctiveness, a certain profile which, according to a State Department expert, Kenneth W. Blackley, to state, 'that there is, indeed, a unique Puerto Rican national character which, far from being undermined, is in the midst of an historical process of self-identification."

The view has been traditionally, in many circles, both inside and outside Latin America, that the United States has militarized Puerto Rican culture. Visiting to the island often gives a sense of fairness discover otherwise.

In certain periods, Puerto Rico has been a hub of important Caribbean and inter-American meetings, a training center for economic and social developers, public administrators, social workers, labor leaders, and others. During the mid-1950s and 60s, Puerto Rico became one of the main third-country training areas in the international field, and a place for educational and cultural exchange programs which brought over 10,000 persons from over 100 countries. Interest developed in the Congress in this experience to the extent that Frank Velez, then assistant to Senator Majority leader Mike Mansfield and later Secretary of the Senate, was sent to investigate. In a Report to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, 85th Congress, 1st Session, Velez observed, "Copra en 1985."

[Note: "Copra en 1985." is not a clear reference or statement within the context of the text. It appears to be a date or a mention of a year.]
Much of the momentum was lost after the Munoz years, but Puerto Rico, in the seventies, continued to turn an interest in the Caribbean as exemplified in its collaboration with Caribbean Economic organizations, such as...

But even more than these official contacts...

Present trends push Puerto Rico towards an active international role even more than the Munoz years. In spite of prevalent negative conditions in Puerto Rico, such as rising labor costs, unemployment and the increase in competitive areas, Puerto Rico has expanded in position in the world trade arena and has refined its manufacturing potential and its infrastructural framework. Its service industries have expanded and its position as a Caribbean communications hub has been strengthened.

We all realize that the Caribbean Basin Initiative has fallen quite short of its original expectations. But today, Puerto Rico's support of this initiative through the imaginative four-plant concept is probably the most catalytic agent to the program.

On another aspect, Puerto Rico has increased its cultural role internationally. The Fifth Centenary of the Encounter of America is being organized through...
The inter-American world. Puerto Rico, as one of the oldest Spanish settlements, has been asked to participate, but will become host to an international congress in 1987. In the fields of sports and recreation, Puerto Ricans compete as islanders with an identity. In the field of higher education, Puerto Rico has also carved its personality by collaborating with Caribbean and Latin American universities and developing a mutual flow of ideas and contacts.

These are all a few examples of a dynamic process underway propelling Puerto Rico into the moving areas of international relations, whether in the field of trade or commerce or in technical or scientific exchanges, or in the areas of cultural and recreation. It is to the advantage of Puerto Rico, to the larger range interests of the United States and to those Caribbean sentiments to facilitate Puerto Rico's role.

A narrow view would hold that since Puerto Rico has not got a separate juridical international personality, it should remain within the straight jacket of traditional diplomacy. Its course been dictated by the State Department.

A broader view would consider Puerto Rico's distinctiveness as an asset, its linkages to the Caribbean as a necessity and its drive for participation in trade, cultural and artistic exchange, sports and recreation, as a force that would not only provide a sense of pride to Puerto Ricans, but would also the economic, social and democratic development of the island.

Under the present status arrangement, there is no restriction to what imaginative men could do in recouping Puerto Rico's momentum with basic American interests. Mechanisms for prior consultation and collaboration should be established between Puerto Rico and the State Department and other U.S. agencies, not merely on ad-hoc basis. I would even go as far as proposing that as a stipulation to the Federal Relations Act, periodic meetings, for example, could be held where the Chief Executive of Puerto Rico could express his special vantage point with regard to American foreign policies which may involve Puerto Rico.

I also fully support the views expressed several years ago by a great constitutionalist, Carl J. Friedrich, that "there is no Alaska why the Commonwealth might not be represented at nonpolitical organizations, forums and conferences which are multiplying in the international field
today!" (Puerto Rico: Middle Road to Freedom, 1959) Rather than dealing with this developing situation in pacification fashion, it should be made a joint statement of policy, a part of the 1952 Compact.
